Groups on Campus

Most university assessment includes group work. Facilitation, loafing, and groupthink appear in real student teams. Clear roles, visible contribution, and permission to question plans reduce loafing and groupthink.

Practical Habits

Assign specific tasks with deadlines. Make contributions visible through shared documents and short check-ins. Invite one person to test the plan as a constructive critic. Agree early how conflict will be raised.

Leadership and Responsibility

Good student leaders clarify goals, share credit, and protect space for disagreement. Responsibility means the group, not only the leader, owns the outcome.

Reflect: Which habit would most improve a group you are in now: visible tasks, constructive critic, or early conflict rules?

Closing

Module 4 linked classic group research to campus practice. Module 5 turns to helping and attraction.
